The Mackinac Center for Public Policy announced Wednesday the launch of its new magazine, MichiganScience. The publication, available both in print and Internet versions, is aimed at providing the science background for a variety of policy discussions.

“Informed policy choices require a basic understanding of scientific questions, not just political ones,” said Diane Katz, the Center’s director of science, environment and technology policy.

The premier issue covers such topics as the environmental trade-offs of renewable energy and guidelines for interpreting science news.
